Religion and the Secular State in Canada

I. THE RELIGIOUS AND SOCIAL COMPOSITION OF CANADA

Canada is a country of 33.8 million people populating a vast geographic area of almost 10 million km², stretching 8,000 km from the Atlantic to the Pacific Oceans. Its current demographic composition is both a natural consequence of its founding peoples, the French Roman Catholics who settled New France (or Lower Canada, now the province of Quebec), the English Protestants who settled Upper Canada (now Ontario) and the aboriginal communities that lived here for millennia⁴, as well as the product of a robust immigrant population from around the world. These complexities make it difficult to pinpoint the religious and social composition of Canada in just one or two sentences. It would be most accurate to describe Canada as a bilingual, multicultural federation operating within a pluralistic society.⁵

The most recent data pertaining to the religious and social composition of Canada was compiled in the 2001 census, at a time when Canada’s population was only 30 million.⁶ Its results reveal that seven out of every ten Canadians self-identified as either Roman Catholic or Protestant,⁷ with almost 13 million identifying as Roman Catholic (almost half of whom live in Quebec), and another 8.6 million identifying as Protestant.⁸ It is worth noting, however, that this represented a decrease from the 80 percent mark of just a decade earlier. This decrease is due both to the significant immigrant populations that increasingly constitute the Canadian mosaic, as well as the fact that in that ten-year period, the percentage of people who claimed no religious affiliation increased from 12 percent to 16 percent (representing 4.9 million people).⁹ Further, the analysis of the 2001 census reported that, “the largest gains in religious affiliations occurred among faiths consistent with changing immigration patterns toward more immigrants from regions outside of Europe, in particular from Asia and the Middle East.” Among this group, those who identified as Muslim recorded the biggest increase.

Statistics on the self-identification of Canada’s religious groups do not, however, tell the whole story of the religious and social composition of this country. While the census data records the religious identification of Canadians, it does not portray the extent of their religious practice or religiosity. As aptly pointed out in a recent article on secularization and religiosity in Canada, “[b]ecause the notion of religiosity is so complex, several different dimensions of human religious participation need to be considered.” A report published in 2006 seeks to measure this more nuanced aspect to Canada’s religious composition by way of an index of religiosity. Its findings reveal that while religion continues to play a significant role in Canada, “the last several decades have witnessed an increasing share of the population reporting no religion and a decreasing share reporting monthly or weekly attendance at religious services.” This move toward secularization has been most acutely felt in Quebec which, over just several decades, moved from being one of the most religious communities in Canada, with a population closely tied to the dictates of the Catholic Church, to one of its most secular. Notwithstanding, or perhaps because of, what some would surmise is an increasingly secular society, there has been a steady stream of cases coming before Canadian courts asserting religious freedom and religious accommodation in both the public and private legal spheres. This Report will attempt to encapsulate the various dimensions of religion and its interaction with the secular state in Canada.

II. THEORETICAL AND SCHOLARLY CONTEXT

This Report on Religion and the Secular State attempts to analyze the relationship of religion and the state in Canada from a variety of perspectives, touching both the private and public law dimensions of this complex issue. The national reporters have been asked to discuss “how the secular State deals with religion or belief in a way that preserves the reciprocal autonomy of State and religious structures and guarantees the Canada, Religions, supra n. 3, one-fifth of the 1.8 million immigrants who arrived in Canada between 1991 and 2001 reported they had no religion, especially those from China (including Hong Kong) and Taiwan.

7. Statistics Canada, Religions, supra n. 3 at 8 (noting that the 2001 Census found that 579,640 people identified as Muslim, 329,995 as Jewish, 300,345 as Buddhist, 297,200 as Hindu and 278,410 as Sikh).

8. Id. (showing an increase from 253,300 in 1991 to 579,600 in 2001 representing an increase from 1 percent to 2 percent of the population). In addition, of the 1.8 million new immigrants who came to Canada during the 1990s, Muslims accounted for 15 percent, Hindus almost 7 percent and Buddhists and Sikhs each about 5 percent.

10. Clark and Schellenberg, supra n. 6. This report used the General Social Survey (GSS) and the 2002 Ethnic Diversity Survey (EDS) to track religious practice as distinct from religious identification. Id.

11. Id. at 2. This index of religiosity is measured by the presence of four dimensions of religiosity: religious affiliation, attendance at religious services, frequency of private religious practice and importance of religion. Id.

12. Id. at 4 The report concluded that overall, 44 percent of Canadians place a high degree of importance on religion in their life and that, judging by the “four dimensions of religiosity,” 40 percent of Canadians have a low degree of religiosity. 31 percent are moderately religious and 29 percent are highly religious. Id.

13. Id. at 6. Note, however, that as pointed out by Kanji and Kuipers, supra n. 9 at 24, “subjective assessments of religiosity are not the same as actual involvement in religious institutions.”

14. This occurred most notably during the 1960s, a period of intense social change in Quebec that is known as the Quiet Revolution.

human right to freedom of religion and belief.”16 The snapshot of the diverse and changing social and religious composition of Canada, provided in the introductory section to this Report, underscores the increasing relevance of this question. However, before delving into a more detailed analysis of this larger question, it is opportune to examine what is meant by the “secular state,” or secularism, in Canada.

Understanding the concept of secularism is key because as legal theorists working in this field have pointed out, “the term ‘secular’ or the declaration that we live in a ‘secular state’ is proposed as the main conceptual means by which Western Liberal societies deal with the expression of religious conscience.”17 The notion of secularism is “generally understood to mean the ordering of public life exclusively on the basis of non-religious practices and values. It is viewed by many as a neutral ground that stands outside religious controversy.”18

At the risk of oversimplification, a closer examination reveals two different meanings that may be ascribed to secularism, one which may be termed “rigid secularism”, the other “open secularism.” These competing visions of secularism were at the forefront of the highly publicized Bouchard-Taylor Commission19 that was constituted in Quebec in February 2007 to investigate the issue of accommodation practices in Quebec in light of it being a pluralistic, democratic and egalitarian society. The Report produced by this Commission aptly pointed out, “We cannot grasp secularism through simple, unequivocal formulas such as “the separation of Church and State”, “State neutrality towards religions” or “the removal of religion from public space”, even though all of these formulas contain part of the truth.20

According to the Commission, the four key principles constituting any model of secularism are: the moral equality of persons; freedom of conscience and religion; State neutrality towards religion; and the separation of Church and State. Secularism, however, takes on a different meaning depending on the importance given to each of these four principles.

A “strict” or “rigid” conception of secularism would accord more importance to the principle of neutrality than to freedom of conscience and religion, attempting to relegate the practice of religion to the private and communal sphere, leaving the public sphere free of any expression of religion.21 Also termed “a-religiousness,” this concept of secularism is obviously less compatible with religious accommodation, as well as antithetical to the recognition of the place of pluralism in the modern state.22 A more “flexible” or “open” secularism, on the other hand, is based on the protection of freedom of religion, even if this requires a relaxation of the principle of neutrality. In this model, state neutrality towards religion and the separation of Church and State are not seen as ends in themselves, but rather as the means to achieving the fundamental objectives of respect for religious and moral equality and freedom of conscience and religion. In open secularism, any tension or contradiction between the various constituent facets of secularism should be resolved in favour of religious freedom and equality. This conception, which sees secularism as directed at state institutions rather than individuals,

16. In their “questionnaire for the preparation of national reports for the IACL Congress,” this was the central question that the general reporters, Professors Javier Martinez-Torron and W. Cole Durham, Jr., asked the national reporters to address.

19. Named as such for the Commission’s co-chairs, Gérard Bouchard and Charles Taylor. Its formal title is the Consultation Commission on Accommodation Practices Related to Cultural Differences.

21. As Richard Moon points out, “Introduction,” supra n. 18 at 17, it is both difficult to draw the line between private and public and unrealistic to confine religion to private life and wholly insulate it from the impact of state law.

does not strive to neutralize or erase religion as an identity marker in society.

Open secularism is the model that is advocated by the Bouchard-Taylor Commission. Moreover, it is the model that recognizes that “secularism and pluralism are both realities of Canadian society.” According to Chief Justice Dickson’s enduring words in the seminal case of R. v. Big M Drug Mart, “[a] truly free society is one which can accommodate a wide variety of beliefs, diversity of tastes and pursuits, customs and codes of conduct.”

By and large, the model of open secularism is applied by Canadian courts in their interpretation of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. A more detailed review of the Canadian position, with respect to the variety of contexts in which we have been asked to examine this issue, will provide a more nuanced and complex picture of religion and the secular state, a picture of what is essentially the “coexistence of religious and non-religious individuals and communities in a diverse contemporary society.”

III. THE CONSTITUTIONAL AND LEGAL CONTEXT

A. Pre-Confederation Period (1759-1867)

In Canada, neither state neutrality in matters of religion, nor the separation of Church and State, is explicitly affirmed in the Constitution, but the courts have gradually inferred such principles from freedom of religion and the prohibition against religious discrimination. The foundations of religious freedom and equality date back to the eighteenth century and result from the political necessities which confronted Great Britain after its conquest of New France from the French Crown in 1759. Despite its initial plan to establish the Anglican Church and to apply, in Canada, the anti-Catholic measures that were in force in Great Britain and in other British colonies, the British government was rapidly impelled to guarantee freedom of worship to its new Catholic subjects in order to ensure their loyalty and dissuade them from joining the American colonists in their anti-British activities (Royal Proclamation, 1763). The Quebec Act, 1774 confirmed this conciliatory policy by authorizing the Catholic Church to collect tithes.

In addition, the Quebec Act abolished the requirement of the “Test Oath”, which required from Catholics seeking public office the abjuration of allegiance to the Pope and a statement against the dogma of transubstantiation and the worship of the Virgin Mary. In other British territories, and even in the United States, it was only several decades later that Catholics obtained similar relief. In addition, while the legislature of Lower Canada (present-day Quebec) passed a statute guaranteeing to persons of the Jewish faith “all rights and privileges of other subjects of Her Majesty” as early as 1832, it was not until more than a quarter of a century later that the British Parliament fully recognized, in 1858,

---

29. An Act for making more effectual Provision for the Government of the Province of Quebec in North America, 14 Geo. III, ch. 83 (1774) [Quebec Act].
30. 1 Will. IV, ch. 57 (1831).
the political rights of Jews. A further milestone for the advancement of religious equality was the adoption of the Freedom of Worship Act, 1851, which forbid any restrictions on the free exercise of religion.31 In 1854, another statute abolished the financial and material benefits that had previously been granted to the Anglican Church. 32 Separation of Church and State was, from then on, clearly established.

B. Federal Constitution of 1867

The political tradition of separation of Church and State thus established was confirmed in the constitutional instrument (adopted by the British Parliament at Westminster) that created the Canadian federation in 1867, the British North America Act.33 The Constitution contained no provisions on the relationship between State and religion, and its preamble made no reference to God or to a Supreme Being. While the earlier legislative measures protecting religion were maintained in force, the Constitution itself did not guarantee freedom of religion, or any other right or freedom for that matter. Such absence of any declaration or bill of rights was consistent with the British principle of parliamentary sovereignty that had been transposed into the Canadian context. It should be noted, however, that the Constitution of 1867 contained an exception to the equality of religions (still in force today) providing special protection, in matters of school administration, for Catholics and Protestants when they are in the minority (such a guarantee was considered necessary in 1867 to reassure religious minorities). 33 As is the case today, in the 1867 Constitution, there was no state religion, nor were religious activities subject to any constitutional restriction. No financial support was provided for churches and the state collected no taxes for redistribution to religious communities. Places of worship were not maintained at public expense. These principles of religious neutrality of the State and separation of political and religious authorities would, thereafter, be regularly reaffirmed in the decisions of higher courts. 35

Thus, until 1982, the principles of religious freedom and equality, and separation of Church and State, were implemented by ordinary legislation in Canada, rather than being provided for in the Constitution, and resulted from pragmatism and political expediency rather than from the application of general principles. This situation has evolved with the formal inclusion of freedom of conscience and religion in the Constitution in 1982.

C. Freedom of Religion and Conscience in the Canadian Charter (1982) and its Jurisprudential Interpretation

The adoption of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms36 in 1982 added to the Constitution an instrument of protection of rights and freedoms, which it was previously lacking, and guaranteed Canadians, inter alia, "freedom of conscience and religion" (art.

---

31. 14 & 15 Vict., ch. 175.
32. Clergy Reserves Act, 18 Vict., c. 2 (1854).
34. Id. art. 93. This aspect will be discussed later in this report, at pp. 20-23, below.
35. For example, in the 1955 case of Chaput v. Romain, [1955] S.C.R. 834, at p. 840. Taschereau J. explained the applicable principles in the following manner: “In our country, there is no state religion. All religions are on an equal footing, and Catholics as well as Protestants, Jews, and other adherents to various religious denominations enjoy the most complete liberty of thought”.
2(a)). In addition, while the Preamble of the Charter contains a reference to the "supremacy of God", this has not yet been given any significant meaning by the courts. As for freedom of conscience and religion, the courts, in particular the Supreme Court of Canada, have construed it as having a double significance.37

First, the Constitution protects both the positive and negative right to the free exercise of religion. The positive content lies in the freedom to hold religious beliefs, to profess them openly and to manifest them through worship, teaching, and propagation; the negative content reflects the right not to be forced, directly or indirectly, to embrace a religious conception or to act contrary to one’s religious or conscientious beliefs. In this latter sense, the Supreme Court stressed that the protection afforded by freedom of conscience and religion also applies to "expressions and manifestations of religious non-belief and refusals to participate in religious practice." 38 Thus, atheism, agnosticism, skepticism and religious indifference are also constitutionally protected.

Second, Canadian courts have ruled that freedom of conscience and religion imposes on the State an obligation of neutrality in religious and conscientious matters. The aspect that has, however, not yet been clearly established is whether the neutrality imposed on the State only prevents it from favouring one religion in particular over others (this first aspect having been clearly recognized) or whether it also prohibits the State from promoting religion in general over other deeply-held convictions, particularly religion-hostile or religion-hostile positions. If this second interpretation of the concept of neutrality were accepted, one would have to conclude that religious accommodations or exemptions are constitutionally prohibited, as they provide an “aid” to religious exercise (such a viewpoint is sometimes presented in the United States). As discussed later in this Report, however, Canadian courts recognize the existence of a duty to accommodate religious convictions, binding on the State on the basis of freedom of religion, which is inconsistent with an interpretation of the obligation of neutrality that would prevent the State from “aiding” religions in a non-discriminatory manner. 39 As will also be seen, half of the Canadian provinces have chosen to fund private religious schools, without this practice having ever been constitutionally challenged as being contrary to the principle of religious neutrality of the State.40

D. The Individualistic and Subjective Conception of Freedom of Religion Adopted by the Supreme Court of Canada

According to traditional Canadian law, a person claiming a religious precept must first prove the objective existence of the precept by establishing that it is based on the teachings of an existing religion. Then, she must demonstrate the sincerity of her belief in the precept, which is a subjective element. In recent times, however, Canadian courts have tended to rely more heavily – or even exclusively – on the subjective sincerity test in order to avoid both having to give an objective definition of religion and taking a position on the merits or value of beliefs or convictions. Thus, the Supreme Court has

37. In particular, see the Big M case, supra note 24.
38. Ibid. at par. 123, per Dickson C.J.: “Religious belief and practice are historically prototypical and, in many ways, paradigmatic of conscientiously-held beliefs and manifestations and are therefore protected by the Charter. Equally protected, and for the same reasons, are expressions and manifestations of religious non-belief and refusals to participate in religious practice”.
39. A number of Canadian authors share the view that the principle of religious neutrality of the State applying in Canada must be considered as less rigorous than the “non-establishment” principle applying in the United States; see among others: Peter W. Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada, Scarborough, Thomson-Carswell, 2005, p. 945; Ryder, supra note 36 at pp. 174-179; Horwitz, supra note 36 at pp. 60-61 (“... aid to religion should be constrained by only two considerations. It must not create an “element of religious compulsion” on the part of any believers or non-believers in a given faith. Also, while government aid may properly create the impression that the state is supportive of religion as it is of other mediating institutions, it should not create the impression that it has singled out a particular faith, or religiosity over non-religiosity, for endorsement. Endorsement, even if it does not compel behavior on the part of the minority, defeats the pluralism and multiculturalism that are a central part of religion’s value to society” [footnotes omitted]).
40. See the section entitled “Financial Support for Religious Private Schools” at pp. 20-23 below.
defined religious liberty as "the freedom to undertake practices and harbour beliefs, having a nexus with religion, in which an individual demonstrates he or she sincerely believes or is sincerely undertaking in order to connect with the divine or as a function of his or her spiritual faith, irrespective of whether a particular practice or belief is required by official religious dogma or is in conformity with the position of religious officials." 41

Such an approach has the advantage of excusing the courts from having to examine the content of religious prescriptions or taking a position with respect to conflicts of doctrine existing within a community of believers. It does, however, also make it more difficult for the courts to reject eccentric or purely opportunistic claims founded upon alleged religious beliefs.

It should also be noted that all Canadian provinces and territories have also adopted human rights legislation that protects freedom of conscience and religion (among other rights and freedoms) and prohibits discrimination based on religion. 42 Although not “entrenched” in the usual constitutional sense, these human rights statutes (which are amendable following the ordinary legislative process) are accorded a kind of “quasi-constitutional” authority insofar as they can be contradicted by another act only in an explicit manner (rather than by mere implication). They can, therefore, serve as a basis for judicial review of provincial legislation, which will be invalidated if found incompatible with the rights and freedoms guaranteed in the applicable provincial human rights statute (unless the impugned legislation contains a provision expressly excluding the latter’s application). Even more importantly, unlike the Charter that applies only to state action, provincial human rights statutes apply to both private relations and state action. As such, they can be invoked against private “actors”, such as employers or providers of goods and services. Provincial human rights acts are ultimately enforced by the Supreme Court of Canada, which interprets and applies them using the same concepts as those it has developed for applying the Charter. Later in this Report, we will examine an important decision of the Supreme Court (the Amselem case43) in which the Court applied the provisions on freedom of religion found in the Quebec human rights statute.44

IV. THE STATE AND RELIGIOUS AUTONOMY

The purpose of this section is to examine whether the state may intervene in the life or organization of religious communities and how far secular law may go in restricting the autonomy of religious communities to govern themselves. The short answer to this question is that in Canada, the state and religious communities operate in separate spheres and, in principle, it is not the role of the state, or secular courts, to intervene in their organization, nor to interfere in their autonomous governance. As Justice Iacobucci of the Supreme Court of Canada stated, “the State is in no position to be, nor should it become, the arbiter of religious dogma.”45

However, as with most issues canvassed in this Report, the immediate response requires a more nuanced analysis. One way to provide such analysis is to focus on a recent Canadian case where this issue arose and where judges, and the academic community commenting on their judgments, responded with different reactions. The case is Bruker v. Marcovitz46 and its facts turn on a promise made in the context of a corollary relief settlement entered into upon the divorce of a married couple. The settlement contained a so-called “get clause” – a commitment on the part of the husband to appear before the Beit Din, or rabbinic tribunal, for the purpose of obtaining a get, or Jewish divorce, thereby releasing his wife religiously from the marriage.47 The husband refused to appear before the Beit Din for over 15 years and the wife initiated an action in the secular courts for monetary damages to compensate her for this extended non-compliance with the commitment to consent to a get.

43. Supra note 41.
44. See the section entitled “Freedom of Religion and Contractual Promises” at 13–15, below.
45. Amselem, supra n. 41 at para 50.

A unanimous Court of Appeal, as well as two dissenting judges of the Supreme Court, found that as the substance of the obligation to consent to the get was exclusively religious in nature, any alleged breach could not be enforced by secular courts. The Court of Appeal held the issue to be non-justiciable before secular courts, since such courts must refrain “from becoming involved in disputes between parties that are internal to their religions.”48 Justice Deschamps, writing for the dissent in the Supreme Court, echoed this view stating “secular law has no effect in matters of religious law . . . . Where religion is concerned, the state leaves it to individuals to make their own choices. It is not up to the state to promote a religious norm. That is left to religious authorities.”

The majority of the Supreme Court, however, found the obligation consented to by the husband to be an enforceable contractual obligation, notwithstanding its link to religion.50 While it is arguable that religious obligations are merely moral obligations and therefore unenforceable, in this instance, the husband was seen as having transformed his moral obligation into a civil or juridical one by voluntarily consenting to perform it in a non-religious contract.51 Moreover, notwithstanding the husband’s argument to the contrary, the enforcement of this contractual obligation was found not to be contrary to his rights based on freedom of religion.52

The complicating factor in this case is that by virtue of internal Jewish religious law and practice, the power to deliver the get is asymmetrical, lying primarily in the hands of the husband, thereby making its effects potentially discriminatory and contrary to the equality rights of women that are protected in Canadian society. Undeniably, Jewish women have sometimes been coerced to consent to unreasonable terms and conditions in order to obtain this religious release from their marriage and to avoid alienation from their community and its religious norms. However, this raises the delicate question of whether the majority’s decision stepped over the line of the secular courts’ jurisdiction by indirectly furthering gender equality for religious women.53 Some see the decision as an inappropriate interference in internal religious decisions and autonomy since “it is not the

47. According to Jewish law, a marriage remains in effect until a get is given by the husband, supervised by the rabbinic tribunal (Beit Din). Without such get, a Jewish woman cannot re-marry with religious sanction and any civilly consecrated marriage will not be recognized by Jewish law. Moreover, any children issuing from a subsequent union are considered illegitimate according to traditional rules of Orthodox Judaism. Rabbi Jonathan Reiss, “Jewish Divorce and the Role of Beit Din” Jewish Action (Winter 1999), online: Jewish Law http://www.jlaw.com/ Articles/divorcebeitt.html.

49. In Bruker, supra n. 46 at para 132.

51. For a contractual analysis by Jukier and Van Praagh see supra n. 46 at 388-398. See also Moore, supra n. 46.

52. The husband’s claim was that the judicial enforcement of this obligation would be contrary to his freedom to abstain from participating in a religious obligation or to appear before a religious tribunal, protected by the Quebec Charter, supra n. 42, s. 3. This issue is discussed in more detail in Section V of this Report, below.

53. See e.g., Moon, “Bruker,” supra n. 46 at 62. Moon is generally favourable to the decision but states that Madam Justice Abella, writing for the majority, was “acting to mitigate the inequity of the divorce rules of Judaism.” Id.
role of secular courts to palliate the discriminatory effect of the absence of a ghet on a Jewish woman who wants to obtain one."54

On the one hand, viewed from the perspective of the dissent, this case may be seen as a crucial test of the state’s secular identity and its commitment to viewing personal faith and law as operating within two parallel universes. On the other hand, viewed from the perspective of the majority, it may be seen, more simply, as a case where religious people happened to have entered into a valid consensual agreement, albeit one with religious overtones, but nonetheless, a case of an ordinary contract to which ordinary contract principles apply.55 To hold otherwise, “might unfairly deny religious individuals the power to make binding legal arrangements based on their values, practices and interests.”56

The Bruker v. Marcovitz decision provides the ideal factual framework to examine the Canadian position on the state and religious autonomy, but it is by no means the only circumstance in which this issue arises. In Bruker, the courts had to grapple with enforcing an ostensibly religious obligation that had been consented to in the context of a civil agreement. The reverse may also occur. Canadian courts have been called upon to enforce contractual provisions (seemingly non-religious ones such as the payment of money) within the context of a religious contract. This has occurred with respect to the enforcement of the payment of the mahr (a lump sum payment claimed by the wife upon divorce) agreed to in the Islamic marriage contract. There is not, as of yet, unanimity on the subject of enforcing such a promise amongst Canadian courts.57

The larger question of the effect given by state courts to decisions made by religious bodies or tribunals is also tied to the question of the state and religious autonomy, which is canvassed in more detail in a subsequent section of this Report dealing with the larger issue of the civil legal effects of religious acts.58

V. LEGAL REGULATION OF RELIGION AS A SOCIAL PHENOMENON

In Canada, religious affiliation of individuals has no legal consequences under State law. Pursuant to the equality clause of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms,59 all Canadians benefit from equality before and under the law without discrimination based on a variety of factors including religion.

The question of whether freedom of religion, protected by section 2(a) of the Charter, may entitle individuals to be exempt from laws or contractual clauses on the basis of conscientious objection is a broader question that merits a more nuanced answer. This section will examine this question first in the context of private law, namely the extent to which freedom of religion entitles individual parties to claim exemption from contractual clauses of general application. It will then examine the question in the context of public law and the requirement that the State provide individuals reasonable accommodation.

---

54. Bruker QCCA, supra n. 48 at para 76. See also Ogilvie, “Bruker,” supra n. 46 at 173, who sees this decision as advocating “a more interventionist role for the civil courts in disputes involving religious issues than has previously been the case in Canadian jurisprudence. One of his criticisms of the decision, expressed at 186, is that “the majority privileged its understanding of the dignity of Jewish women and the equality of women and children in law over Marcovitz’ religious freedom”.

55. This is largely the conclusion adopted by by Jukier and Van Praagh, supra n. 46.

56. Moon, “Bruker,” supra n. 46 at 47.

58. See Section VII of this Report, below, entitled “Civil Legal Effects of Religious Acts,” in particular, part C: “Civil Effects of Religious Decisions outside the Family Context.”

59. Charter, supra n. 25, s. 15.
from laws of general application on the basis of religious objection.

A. Freedom of Religion and Contractual Promises

At the outset, it should be noted that the protective function of the federal Charter of Rights and Freedoms is limited to State action, namely laws of general application or governmental action. Private agreements between individuals are thus not subject to the federal Charter and any religious protections must be found in equivalent provisions in provincial human rights codes or the Quebec Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms.

The precise question of whether freedom of religion entitles a contracting party to be exempt from a provision in a private agreement arose in the Canadian context in the seminal case of Syndicat Northcrest v. Amselem. That case concerned a private contract entered into by a co-owner of an apartment unit in a Montreal condominium. Under the terms of the by-laws in the declaration of co-ownership, the owners of the individual units contractually agreed not to erect any constructions of any kind on their balconies. While the purpose of such restriction was to create a clean and uniform outward appearance of the building, it resulted in a legal battle over the right of one of the condominium owners to erect a temporary structure, a Succah (a form of hut), on his balcony in order for him to observe the week-long Jewish High Holiday of Succot.

The unusual aspect of this claim to freedom of religion was that it was not, as is most often the case, being asserted against the State. The assertion of the right to freedom of religion in this case effectively pit one party’s contractual rights against the religious freedom of the other contracting party. Notwithstanding the express contractual stipulations of the parties, a narrow majority (5 to 4) of the Supreme Court found in favour of the condominium owner’s claim to freedom of religion, thereby entitling him to an exemption from the contractual restriction in question and entitling him to erect his Succah on his balcony. The net result of this decision was, in effect, to extend the reasonable accommodation principle to the private contractual arena.

The very weight one dissenting judge, Justice Binnie, placed on the private contract voluntarily made between the parties caused him to rule in favour of the applicability of the contractual restriction, notwithstanding its potential to violate one of the party’s religious freedoms. He concluded that “there is a vast difference . . . between using freedom of religion as a shield against interference with religious freedoms by the State and as a sword against co-contractants in a private building.”

While the circumstances under which a party may waive a fundamental right, such as religion, are not precisely delineated in the Amselem decision, Justice Iacobucci, writing for the majority, implies that if done properly, clearly and with full consent, such a waiver is possible. However, he found there to be no valid waiver in this case because it was

61. See examples given in supra n. 42.
62. Amselem, supra n. 41.
63. This seminal case has been discussed at 9–10, above, in section 3 of the Report dealing with the Constitutional and Legal Contexts, as this case provided the factual context in which the Supreme Court articulated the subjective definition of religion. As such, it mattered little for the majority that expert religious testimony did not support the religious obligation of erecting one’s own succah. Mr. Amselem’s sincere, subjective belief in his religious requirement to erect his own Succah sufficed to ground his claim in freedom of religion.
64. Amselem, supra n. 41 at para. 185. Note that there were two dissenting opinions in this case. Bastarache J, with whom 2 other judges concurred, dissented on grounds related to the definition of religion itself. Binnie, J. dissented on his own based on contract waiver.
not “voluntary, freely expressed and with a clear understanding of the true consequences and effects.” In fact, it was made in the context of a non-negotiated adhesion contract, to which the co-owner had no choice but to adhere. Further, it was not explicit given that the restriction on erecting any structures on the balconies was so general that it would hardly convey to ordinary individuals a waiver of their right to freedom of religion.

On the other hand, the Bruker v. Marcovitz case, discussed in a preceding section of this Report, may be seen as an instance where a court enforced a contractual waiver in the context of a religiously-protected right. Although waiver did not form an explicit part of the Supreme Court judgment, the fact that the majority enforced the husband’s contractual promise to appear before the religious tribunal, despite his claim that this would interfere with his freedom of (or rather from) religion, is implicit recognition that a contractual waiver is indeed possible. The problem becomes how to distinguish Amselem, where the Court did not accept such waiver and freedom of religion trumped private contract law, and Bruker, where contract seemed to trump freedom of religion. For one, there is no doubt that the factual bases of the two decisions are different. On the facts of Bruker, it would be hard to assert lack of knowledge or consent to the explicit and clear obligation contained in a negotiated agreement, prepared with the assistance of legal advice, to appear before the religious tribunal to obtain a religious divorce.

As does the Bruker case, Amselem demonstrates that an inquiry into religion and law is not exclusively a public law narrative, nor one that always takes the form of drawing lines around state power. The Amselem decision is potentially far-reaching in its holding that contractual obligations may be unenforceable if they infringe individual religious freedom, defined broadly as encompassing not necessarily what religious authorities state is a religious obligation, but anything that a person views as a religious practice, according to his or her conscience. After Bruker, however, this holding may be nuanced depending on the circumstances of the contract and its effectiveness in waiving this fundamental right.

B. Freedom of Religion and State Law – Reasonable Accommodation

Under provincial (and federal) human rights legislation, Canadian courts have established the existence of a “duty to accommodate” religious beliefs or practices that is imposed on private actors as well as on public authorities acting in their executive or administrative capacity. The courts also admit, but with more reservation, the existence of a similar obligation imposed on state authorities when the latter adopt rules of general application, such as laws or regulations. In such instances, rather than “reasonable accommodation”, one will speak of a "constitutional exemption", which can then be claimed under a provincial or federal human rights statute or under the Charter. The duty to accommodate, or the obligation to provide for an exemption, can be based on freedom of religion (in the case of an infringement of that freedom) or on the prohibition against religious discrimination (when religious discrimination has been established).

Thus, in R. v. Videoflicks Ltd., the Court of Appeal for Ontario found that the Retail Business Holidays Act of Ontario, which prohibited retail business activities on Sundays, infringed the freedom of religion of Jewish business owners. For sincere religious reasons, the latter closed their businesses on Saturdays, but could not avail themselves of the exemption provided in the statute, the benefit of which was restricted to small businesses not exceeding a certain number of employees. The Court of Appeal therefore held that the law was of no force or effect as to them, which amounted to the creation of a "constitutional exemption" to their benefit with respect to the law insofar as it infringed their freedom of religion. The decision of the Court of Appeal for Ontario was, however, overturned by the Supreme Court of Canada in Edwards Books72. In that decision, the majority of the Court held the Retail Business Holidays Act to be valid without finding it necessary to enlarge or add to the exemption already provided in the statute by the legislature. The Court began by recognizing that the law had a valid secular objective, which was to secure a common weekly day of rest for all workers.73 It also accepted that the law had the effect of restricting the freedom of religion of those who observed the Sabbath by imposing upon them an additional financial burden not suffered by those who observed Sunday as a religious day. Specifically, they would be forced to close their businesses for two days a week, Saturday for religious reasons and Sunday as a result of the law, while Sunday observers could close only on Sunday and simultaneously satisfy not only their religious requirements but the law’s as well. While acknowledging that the Ontario legislature was required to accommodate, as far as possible, those whose religion required them to close a day other than Sunday, the majority took the view that the exemption already provided in the law constituted an adequate accommodation, and that enlarging the existing exemption for larger businesses would endanger the effectiveness of the legislation. This completely reversed the findings of the Ontario Court of Appeal, which had held that the legislature had not gone far enough in the way of accommodation and should have granted an exemption to all businesses that close on Saturday for religious reasons, whatever the number of their employees. Subsequently, and despite the favourable Supreme Court judgment, the Ontario government took the initiative to extend the exemption to all businesses, regardless of their size, closing on any day other than Sunday for religious reasons.74

The limits of the duty to accommodate imposed on private actors or public authorities acting in an executive or administrative capacity are assessed through the concept of "undue hardship" (the proof of excessive financial cost or administrative inconvenience, or infringement of rights of others, extinguishing the duty).75 The extent and limits of the duty of state authorities to provide for religious exemptions when enacting rules of general application (acts of the legislature or executive regulations) are assessed by applying the limitation clauses of the various constitutional or legislative human rights instruments. For example, the limitation clause contained in section 1 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms permits "such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society". In order for a restriction on a right or freedom to be considered justifiable, section 1 has been interpreted as requiring that such restriction be imposed for a purpose that is "pressing and substantial", and that the means used by the legislature be rationally connected to this purpose, be the least restrictive possible and, finally, that the beneficial effects of the restriction be

73. In the Big M case, supra n. 24, the Supreme Court found the federal Sunday Act invalid because it imposed the closing of businesses on Sunday for reasons of religious observance. The court held that the purpose of the legislation was to compel the entire population to observe Christian religious dictates, which was incompatible with freedom of religion. In the Edwards Books case, the purpose of the Ontario statute, which similarly prohibited retail business on Sunday, was the secular one of providing a common day of rest for retail employees. The Court obviously considered such a purpose as legitimate and validated the law after concluding that it restricted freedom of religion in a justifiable way.
74. The Canadian Parliament and the provincial legislatures have adopted on their own initiative, without any constitutional obligation being imposed on them by the courts, numerous laws that contain religious exemptions or accommodations. For example, the Canada Evidence Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. C-5, s. 14, allows a person to make a solemn affirmation instead of taking an oath; the Canada Labour Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. L-5, s. 70, exempts members of a bargaining unit from paying union dues on the basis of religious objection; the Ontario Immunization of School Pupils Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. I.1, s. 3(3), exempts parents who have filed a statement of conscience or religious belief from immunizing their children; the Quebec Animal Health Protection Act, R.S.Q., ch. P-42, s. 55.9.15, permits ritual practices involving animals prescribed by the laws of a religion.
75. See the commentary on the Amselem case in the previous sub-section, at pp. 13-15 above.
proportionate to its harmful effects.

A 2009 decision of the Supreme Court of Canada illustrates how this “test” has been applied in respect of an application for a religious exemption. In that case, members of a Hutterian community in Alberta claimed an exemption from the requirement to provide personal photo identification to obtain a license to drive motor vehicles. Although the Supreme Court acknowledged that this requirement did infringe their freedom of religion, the Court nonetheless refused to uphold the constitutional exemption which had been granted at the lower levels by the court of first instance and the Court of Appeal for Alberta. The Supreme Court, by a majority of four out of seven judges, held that the legislative purpose of preventing identity theft related to the use of a fraudulent driver’s license would not be achieved with sufficient efficacy if the exemption sought by the Hutterian Brethren was granted. In addition, the majority considered that the deleterious effects on freedom of religion were less important than the beneficial effects of the impugned regulation. In this regard, they stressed that freedom of religion does not protect believers against all ancillary costs associated with their religious practice and that the denial of a driver’s license was not, in this case, a cost high enough to deprive complainants of the freedom to make a meaningful choice as to religious belief or practice (to the extent that they could arrange third party transport or hire someone for this purpose).

Conversely, the three dissenting judges emphasized the tradition of communal rural life and self-sufficiency of the Hutterian claimants, and noted that the survival of this tradition demanded that some of their members be able to drive cars to ensure necessary contact with the outside world. For the minority, the obligation of the photo on the license was a form of indirect coercion, having the effect of placing the plaintiffs in an impossible situation where they had to choose between remaining faithful to their religious beliefs or giving up the self-sufficiency of their communities. The deeper motivation of the majority decision seems to lie in a reluctance to recognize the existence of an obligation of the State to allow for religious exemptions to rules of general application like statutes and regulations. In a passage reminiscent of the majority decision of the United States Supreme Court in Employment Division v. Smith (494 U.S. 872 [1990]), the majority in the Hutterian Brethren case asserted: “Freedom of religion presents a particular challenge [...] because of the broad scope of the Charter guarantee. Much of the regulation of a modern state could be claimed by various individuals to have a more than trivial impact on a sincerely held religious belief. Giving effect to each of their religious claims could seriously undermine the universality of many regulatory programs, including the attempt to reduce abuse of driver’s licences at issue here, to the overall detriment of the community.”

VI. STATE FINANCIAL SUPPORT FOR RELIGION

State financial support for religion is an issue that concerns both direct and indirect forms of support. For the most part, indirect forms of support take the form of tax exemptions and these will be dealt with briefly in the first part of this section. The following part will address the availability of financial support for religious private schools in Canada.

A. Indirect Financial Support for Religion

79. Id., par. 36 (McLachlin, C.J.).
There are several basic forms of indirect financial support for religious institutions in Canada. One relates to an exemption from the payment of property taxes for land owned or leased by a church or religious organization and used as a “place of worship.”\(^{80}\) Another entitles religious institutions to a partial recovery of the federally-imposed Goods and Services Tax (GST) and the various Provincial Sales Taxes (PST) paid on goods and services acquired by the religious institution.\(^{81}\)

The other forms of indirect support for religion are related to the special tax treatment Canada’s income tax system provides to registered charities, a category into which most religious institutions fall. First, income earned by such charities is exempt under Canada’s Income Tax Act.\(^{82}\) As is the case with the exemption from property taxes, this is the functional equivalent of a government subsidy because instead of the government providing religious institutions with direct financial support for their activities, they essentially waive any taxes owing.

Furthermore, if individuals or corporations donate to charities, they will receive a tax credit or tax deduction for their contribution.\(^{83}\) This provides a strong incentive for people to support religious institutions and enables these institutions to secure funding for their activities, with indirect support from the government. Generally speaking, these subsidies for religious-based institutions are justified on the basis that, like other charities, they provide socially desirable benefits that would otherwise have to be provided by governments directly.\(^{84}\)

Undoubtedly, religious institutions stand to benefit significantly from these indirect forms of state support, but these forms of taxation relief only apply if the religious institution in question successfully registers as charity.\(^{85}\) The general legal test for charitable status remains the one laid out in a 19\(^{\text{th}}\) century English House of Lords decision.\(^{86}\) According to this case, charitable activities include “the relief of poverty, the advancement of education, the advancement of religion, and other purposes beneficial to the community.”\(^{87}\) While “churches, synagogues, mosques, and temples, and closely related institutions such as schools, colleges, and eleemosynary organizations normally qualify for registration,”\(^{88}\) the issue of charitable status for religious institutions has not been free from controversy in Canada. For example, there is ongoing debate over the recognition of charitable status for the Church of Scientology which, as it currently stands, has not been extended charitable status by the Canada Revenue Agency.\(^{89}\)

---

80. See e.g. Assessment Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. A.31, ss. 3(1)(3), 4; An Act respecting Municipal taxation, R.S.Q. c. F-2.1, ss. 204(8),(12); Vancouver Charter, S.B.C. 1953, c. 55 s. 396(11)(c)(iv); Municipal Government Act, R.S.A. 2000, c. M-26, s. 326(1)(k). Eligible charities are also entitled to rebates for municipal taxes: see e.g: Municipal Act, S.O. 2001, c. 25, s. 361(1)-(13).

82. Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985 (5th Su), c. 1, s. 149(1)(f) [hereinafter Canadian ITA]. The same exception applies for Provincial Income Taxes: see e.g. Income Tax Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. 12, s. 6 [hereinafter Ont. ITA]; Income Tax Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 215, s. 27(1)(a) [hereinafter B.C. ITA]; Alberta Income Tax Act, R.S.A. 2000, c. A-26, s. 7(a); The Income Tax Act, R.S.M. 1988, c. 110, C.C.S.M. c. 110, s. 3(3)(a) [hereinafter Man. ITA]; Income Tax Act, R.S.S. 1978, c. I-2, s. 9(a).

83. Individuals receive a tax credit pursuant to Canadian ITA, Id., s. 118.1(3) and corporations receive a deduction pursuant to Canadian ITA, Id., s. 110.1. Similar tax benefits exist under provincial legislation: see e.g. Ont. ITA, Id., s. 3.1(18); B.C. ITA, Id., s. 4.4; Alberta Personal Income Tax Act, R.S.A. 2000, c. A-30, s. 11; Income Tax Act, 2000, S.S. 2000, c. I-2, s. 21; Man. ITA, Id., s. 4.6(18).

84. But see Bruce Chapman et al., eds., Between State and Market: Essay on Charities Law and Policy in Canada (Montreal: McGill-Queen’s University Press, 2001) for a critique of these tax subsidies.

85. Canadian ITA, supra n. 82, ss. 149.1, 248.

87. Id. at 583

89. As of January, 2010, according to the Canada Revenue Agency’s Charities Directorate accessible online
B. Financial Support for Religious Private Schools

As has been seen in a previous section90, the principle of religious neutrality of the State, which the Supreme Court of Canada considers to be an implicit consequence of freedom of religion, does not appear to mean that the State should be forbidden from aiding the free exercise of religion, provided that all religions are treated equally. According to this reasoning, public funding of private religious schools would be seen as constitutionally permissible91. The courts have not yet been asked to decide on this issue92 and in actual practice, five of the ten Canadian provinces fund private religious schools at varying levels93.

On the other hand, the Ontario policy of denying public funding for private schools, including religious schools, has been the subject of challenges based first on the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, and later on the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights94. It must be remembered that under Article 93 of the Constitution Act, 1867 (for information on this provision, see the historical development section above), Ontario is constitutionally obliged to fund Roman Catholic “separate” schools, which are legally regarded as public schools. Moreover, the province of Ontario funds public schools, which are secular. Thus, while refusing to fund private religious schools, Ontario does fund the public secular schools as well as public “separate” Catholic schools.

In Adler95, the applicant challenged the refusal of public funding of Jewish and independent Christian schools as being contrary to freedom of religion and the prohibition against discrimination based on religion. In the Supreme Court, a majority relied on Section 93 of the Constitution Act, 1867 to dismiss the appeal, considering that it was not possible to invoke the rights guaranteed in the Charter to contradict or neutralize another provision of the Canadian Constitution. In dissent, McLachlin and L’Heureux-Dubé J. were of the opinion that there existed an indirect discrimination (or “adverse effect” discrimination) based on religion, insofar as the Ontario policy had the effect of denying a benefit to people whose religion did not allow them to send their children to secular public schools. Madam Justice McLachlin, however, concluded that the discrimination was justifiable in light of the limitation provision contained in section 1 of the Charter, and took the view that encouraging the establishment of a more tolerant multicultural society was a pressing and substantial objective, and that the public school system offered the best means to achieve this goal. Moreover, in her opinion, McLachlin J. stated that it

---

90. See the section on “Freedom of Religion and State Law – Reasonable Accommodation” at pp. 16-18 above.

91. To the same effect, see, among others: Peter W. Hogg, supra, n. 39 at 810-811; Robert A. Sedler, “The Constitutional Protection of Freedom of Religion, Expression and Association in Canada and the United States: A Comparative Analysis”, (1988) 20 Case W. Res. J. of Int’l. L. 577, 584 (“In any event, because of the absence of a non-establishment component in section 2a), the government is not required to be neutral toward religion. Governmental practices that favor religion over non-religion or that favor one religion over another religion, are not as such violative of section 2a). It is only where the governmental action has the action of imposing “coercive burdens on the exercise of religious beliefs” that it may be found violative of section 2a”).

92. In the Big M case, supra footnote 24, at par. 107-09, Dickson J. expressly left open the question of whether the Charter permits the State to support financially private religious institutions. Nor has the question been decided in Adler v. Ontario, [1996] 3 S.C.R. 609, where the Supreme Court however decided that the Charter did not require the state to provide such a financial support.

93. British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, and Quebec.

95. Adler, id.
was impossible to say whether a less intrusive means, like the partial funding of private religious schools, would achieve the goal with the same efficacy. Conversely, Madam Justice L’Heureux-Dubé held that even if the Ontario policy had the valid purpose of promoting the greatest possible attendance in secular public schools, the refusal of any financing of private religious schools went beyond what was required to achieve this goal and was therefore not a "minimum impairment". For her, the allocation of partial funding would have given some aid and recognition to religious minorities without compromising the secular and universal character of public schools.

As such, the position adopted by the Supreme Court in the Adler case allowed for the continued discrimination between the treatment of Catholic schools on the one hand, and other religious schools on the other. The fact that such discrimination was shielded by section 93 of the Constitution Act, 1867 did not, however, protect it against a challenge based on section 26 of the United Nations Covenant. In the Waldman case (the complainant was Jewish and had to pay nearly $15,000 per year to send his children to a private non-subsidized Jewish school), the United Nations Committee on Human Rights had little difficulty concluding that the funding by Ontario of Catholic schools, but not schools of other religions, amounted to discrimination based on religion, and that the concerns that led to the protection of the rights of Catholics in section 93 of the Constitution Act, 1867 could no longer justify such discrimination today. The Committee observed that the Covenant does not oblige States to fund private religious schools; however, if they choose to do so they must proceed in a non-discriminatory manner.

The Ontario government’s initial position was that it would refuse to correct the discrimination by either accepting to fund religious schools other than Catholic schools or by stopping the funding of Catholic schools. It is true that Ontario is constitutionally obliged to fund Catholic schools under section 93 of the Constitution Act, 1867, but, as emphasized by the complainant in the Waldman case, two other provinces, Newfoundland and Quebec, have obtained exemptions from the obligations arising from the same article (or, in the case of Newfoundland, under similar constitutional provisions) by constitutional amendments adopted in 1997 and 1998. Nevertheless, shortly after the pronouncement by the U.N. Committee, Ontario adopted changes to its tax law to allow parents who pay tuition to send their children to private schools (and who are also required to pay public school taxes) to include this expense as a deduction in their tax return.

VII. CIVIL LEGAL EFFECTS OF RELIGIOUS ACTS

This section will discuss the extent to which, in Canada, secular law recognizes and enforces acts performed, and decisions made, according to religious law. These issues will be examined in the context of Marriage and Divorce, where they frequently arise, as well as more broadly, within the realm of the internal autonomy of religious communities.

96. Id., at par. 193 and ff.
97. Id., at par. 56 and ff.
98. Waldman, supra footnote 94.
99. Given this conclusion, the Committee found it unnecessary to consider the two other arguments of the applicant, respectively based on Article 18 (freedom of religion) and Article 27 (rights of ethnic, religious, and linguistic minorities) of the Covenant.
100 “[…] the Committee observes that the Covenant does not oblige States parties to fund schools which are established on a religious basis. However, if a State party chooses to provide public funding to religious schools, it should make this funding available without discrimination. This means that providing funding for the schools of one religious group and not for another must be based on reasonable and objective criteria. In the instant case, the Committee concludes that the material before it does not show that the differential treatment between the Roman Catholic faith and the author’s religious denomination is based on such criteria. Consequently, there has been a violation of the author’s rights under article 26 of the Covenant to equal and effective protection against discrimination” (par. 10.6).
A. Marriage and Divorce

Pursuant to the Canadian Constitution, while marriage falls under the competence of the federal government, the solemnization of marriage falls under provincial competence, and it is mainly to provincial legislation to which we must turn to discern the civil legal effects of religious marriages. Today, in every province, there is explicit recognition by secular law of religiously performed marriages by every minister of religion authorized to solemnize marriages. As such, everywhere in Canada, in respect of marriage, “the civil contract and the religious sacrament can be performed simultaneously.”

There are, however, two main issues concerning marriage that involve the delicate intersection between secular law and religion. The first arises in the context of Canada’s recognition of same-sex marriages. Following a reference by the federal government to the Supreme Court of Canada, Parliament enacted the Civil Marriage Act in 2005 which defines marriage as “the lawful union of two persons to the exclusion of all others.” This Act made Canada only the fourth country in the world to legislate same-sex marriage.

Because same-sex marriage may be repugnant to the religious beliefs of certain faith communities, this new legislation had the potential to interfere within the religious domain, and provision needed to be made to protect religious officials from state compulsion to perform same-sex marriages against their religious beliefs. As such, the Civil Marriage Act contains, both in its Preamble and in section 3, specific recognition that officials of religious groups are free to refuse to perform marriages that are not in accordance with their religious beliefs. This is echoed in some provincial legislation.

While Canadians may marry pursuant to a civilly-recognized religious ceremony, they may also choose to marry civilly with no religious sanction. The interesting question that arises in this context is whether a marriage commissioner may conscientiously object to performing a civil same-sex marriage due to his own religiously-held beliefs. As solemnization of marriage is within provincial competence, the answer is not uniform across the country. Prince Edward Island is thus far the only province to have enacted specific protection allowing anyone authorized to solemnize a marriage to refuse to do so if it conflicts with that person’s religious beliefs. It has been said that this issue “sets

101. Constitution Act, 1867, supra n. 33, ss. 91(26), 92(12).
106. The other countries were the Netherlands (2001), Belgium (2003) and Spain (2005). For an overview of this historical evolution and description of this legislation as well as court decisions in the area of same-sex marriage see Mary C. Hurley, “Bill C-38: The Civil Marriage Act” Legislative Summaries, online: Library of Parliament - Parliamentary Information and Research Service http://www2.parl.gc.ca/Sites/LOP/LegislativeSummaries/Bills_s.asp?Parl=38&Sex=s1&Is=38.
107. In Reference Re Same-Sex Marriage, supra n. 104 at para. 58, the Supreme Court held that s. 2(a) of the Charter, supra n. 25 was sufficiently broad to offer such protection to religious officials from performing same-sex marriage contrary to their religious beliefs.
108. Supra. n. 105.
109. As the solemnization of marriage falls under provincial jurisdiction, provincial legislation is needed to protect religious officials in a similar way. See Ontario Marriage Act, supra n. 102, s. 20(6); Art. 367 C.C.Q.; PEI Marriage Act, supra n. 102, s. 11(1).
110. PEI Marriage Act, supra n. 102, s. 11(1) as am. by R.S.E.I. 2005, c.12, s. 7. Although there was a Bill proposed in New Brunswick to the same effect, it never came into effect.
the stage for (yet another) conflict between religious freedom and sexual orientation, between religion-based constitutional claims and (sexual orientation) equality claims. 111

The one case in Canada where this was recently tested before the courts seems to indicate that barring specific legislative permission to do so, civil officials will not be able to claim conscientious objection, based on religious grounds, to refuse to perform a same-sex marriage. In Nichols v. Saskatchewan (Human Rights Commission), 112 Justice McMurtry upheld a decision of the provincial Human Rights Commission to fine a Saskatchewan civil marriage commissioner $2,500 for refusing to perform his public service for a same-sex couple. The Court held that as a government actor, he was “not entitled to discriminate, regardless of his private beliefs.” 113 As Professor MacDougall asserts, to do otherwise would be to allow a “religious ‘veto’ over the availability of a public service.” 114

The second issue involving the intersection between religion and the secular state in the area of marriage concerns polygamous marriage. While Canada has made polygamy a criminal offence pursuant to s. 293(1) of the Criminal Code, 115 at least one Canadian community continues to adhere openly to plural marriage. 116 Although the practice is not widespread in Canada, it has brought to the forefront the potential clash between Canada’s criminalization of polygamy and the constitutional protection of religious freedom. Some commentators assert that the paucity of prosecutions for polygamy relates to a concern that “the Criminal Code prohibitions on polygamy are vulnerable to constitutional challenge,” 117 although several predict that any such challenge would not be successful. 118

The legal repercussions of polygamous marriages go beyond their potential criminality and extend to matters of immigration 119 as well as to issues surrounding spousal support and matrimonial property division. 120 And while contrary to the law in Canada, for certain limited purposes, a polygamous marriage entered into validly in a

---

113. Id., at para 73.

114. Supra n. 111 at 353. But see Ryder, supra n. 36 at 191. Ryder is less categorical on this issue and points out that “human rights jurisprudence supports the rights of employees, whether in the public or the private sector, whether or not they are religious officials, to object to the performance of job duties on religious grounds and employers have an obligation to accommodate them if they can do so without undue hardship”. Id.

115. R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46. Further, the definition of marriage in the Civil Marriage Act, supra n. 105, as “the lawful union of two persons to the exclusion of all others” excludes polygamy from the Canadian conception of marriage. Bigamy is also indictable offence pursuant to s. 290(1) of the Criminal Code.

116. This community is Bountiful, British Columbia where according to Professor Angela Campbell, who has done empirical research about this community, until two male community leaders were arrested on polygamy charges in January, 2009 (such charges being subsequently dropped), Bountiful’s residents, who belong to the Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, have been practicing polygamy for decades without state interference. See Angela Campbell, “Bountiful Voices” (2009) 47 Osgoode Hall L.J. 183; Angela Campbell, “Wives’ Tales: Reflecting on Research in Bountiful” (2008) 23 C.J.L.S. 121; Robert Matas and Wendy Stueck, “Polygamy Charges in Bountiful” The Globe and Mail (7 January 2009), online: The Globe and Mail http://www.theglobeandmail.com/news/national/article963758.ece. Recently, one of Bountiful’s religious leaders who was charged with polygamy last year has even filed a lawsuit against the provincial government for damages due to “unlawful” prosecution. See Keith Fraser, “Polygamist sect leader sues B.C. government” The National Post (13 January, 2010), online: National Post http://www.nationalpost.com/story.html?id=2438556.

120. Kelly, supra n. 118 at 30-37.
jurisdiction that recognizes such marriages, by persons domiciled in that jurisdiction at the time of the marriage, may be given some effect in Canada.121

As is the case with marriage, divorce is also within the federal government’s jurisdiction.122 With respect to the interface between religion and divorce, it is worth noting that the Canada Divorce Act123 contains, in section 21.1, a provision which prevents a spouse from exercising his civil rights in a divorce for so long as he refuses to remove a religious barrier to divorce, such as the granting of a religious divorce. This provision was enacted after consultation with, and through the urging of, the Jewish community since in the Jewish religion, despite a civil divorce, a marriage remains in effect until a get (or religious divorce supervised by the rabbinic tribunal called the Beit Din) is given by the husband and accepted by the wife.124 This section of the Divorce Act may be seen as palliating a potentially unfair withholding of such a divorce by the husband, without which the wife cannot remarry within her faith.

B. Religious Arbitration in Family Matters

The issue of the legitimacy of religious arbitration in family matters attracted a great deal of attention in Canada when the Islamic Institute of Civil Justice sought to create a “Shari’a Court” in Ontario in 2003. The purpose behind this proposed religious arbitral body was the settlement of personal disputes involving Muslims related to inheritance and family matters. Key to this proposal was that such decisions would be legally binding and judicially enforceable by Ontario courts.125 This recommendation resulted in intense controversy126 “triggering heightened concern for the well-being of vulnerable members of society”127 such as women and children, as well as “concerns about individual autonomy and community compulsion.”128

As a result, the Ontario government mandated a study, commonly known as the “Boyd Report,”129 which concluded that Ontario should allow individuals to choose religious arbitration as a reflection of Canada’s multicultural society as long as minimal safeguards, concerning such things as the legitimacy of consent and judicial review procedures, were put into place. The Ontario government did not follow these recommendations, choosing instead to reject all state-sanctioned religious arbitrations. Amendments to the province’s Arbitration Act were passed requiring all family arbitrations to be conducted exclusively in accordance with Ontario or Canadian law.130 It

121. See Tse v. Minister of Employment & Immigration [1983] 2 F.C. 308, 144 D.L.R. (3d) 155 (upholding a polygamous marriage entered into in Hong Kong as valid for purposes of establishing the legal status of a child).
122. Loi constitutionnelle de 1867, supra n. 33, s. 91(26).
123. R.S.C. 1985 (2nd Sess., 38) c. 3.
124. This issue was at the forefront of the recent Supreme Court of Canada decision in Bruker, supra n. 46, discussed in section 4 of this report entitled “The State and Religious Autonomy” at 10-13, above. See generally Jukier and Van Praagh supra n. 46.
126. In June 2005, a “No Religious Arbitration Coalition” was formed which included most Canadian feminist organizations and some Muslim organizations. See Natasha Bakht, “Were Muslim Barbarians Really Knocking on the Gates of Ontario?: The Religious Arbitration Controversy – Another Perspective” in Murphy and Molinari, Id. 229 at 237-38.
128. Id.
130. See Prithi Yelaja and Robert Benzie, “McGuinty: No sharia law” The Toronto Star (12 September 2005) A1 (QL) (the premier of Ontario, Dalton McGuinty, announced that “there will be no sharia law in Ontario. There will be no religious arbitration in Ontario. There will be one law for all Ontarians”). As a result, Bill 27, Family Statute Law Amendment Act, 2006, 2nd Sess., 38th Leg., Ontario, 2006 (assented to 23 February 2006), S.O. 2006 c.1, was passed amending the Arbitration Act, 1991, S.O. 1991, c. 17 and providing that all family law arbitrations must be conducted exclusively in accordance with the law of Ontario or of another Canadian is important to point out that despite these amendments, parties are not prohibited from choosing to settle their family matters according to religious norms, or before a religious authority, as any such prohibition would constitute a violation of freedom of religion. The amendments merely assert that such religious arbitration will not be automatically legally binding or enforceable before a state court of law.\textsuperscript{131} Given the public order nature of family decisions, the same would be true in the rest of Canada and as such, a secular court will not grant a divorce on terms arrived at by religious mediation or arbitration, or sanction a religious decision on any family matter, unless that court deems it consonant with Canadian law and policy.

\textit{C. Civil Effects of Religious Decisions outside the Family Context}

The final question to address is what effect does the state give to religious decisions made by religious bodies or courts outside the family context. While it is tempting to assert categorically, as does Justice Deschamps in dissent in the Supreme Court decision of\textit{ Bruker v. Marcovitz},\textsuperscript{132} that civil courts and religious undertakings must operate in non-intersecting spheres, the reality is slightly more complicated.

In general, Canadian courts do decline to intervene in the internal matters of a religious body and in deciding questions pertaining to religious doctrine.\textsuperscript{133} Religious organizations are viewed as voluntary associations over which courts are slow to exercise jurisdiction.\textsuperscript{134} For example, it was held to be inappropriate for a secular court to interfere with a decision taken by a religious council responsible for supervising and certifying products and establishments complying with Jewish dietary laws.\textsuperscript{135} Likewise, courts will generally enforce contractual stipulations pursuant to which parties agree to submit their disputes to religious arbitration.\textsuperscript{136}

There are instances, however, where it may be appropriate for Canadian judges to interfere with, or refuse to enforce, decisions taken by religious bodies where it is "necessary to prohibit practices that are harmful, that violate civil or property rights or that infringe a person's constitutional rights."\textsuperscript{137} As such, intervention by secular courts occurs in instances where the court finds some procedural irregularity or breach of natural justice.\textsuperscript{138} In Lakeside Colony of Hutterian Brethren \textit{v. Hofer},\textsuperscript{139} the Supreme Court of Canada refused to enforce a decision by a religious community to expel one of its members and thereby deprive him of his property in the colony on the ground that such expulsion was invalid for lack of notice and procedural fairness.

The above examination demonstrates that while Canada is said to espouse a separation between secular courts and internal religious decision-making, this principle of non-intervention is somewhat more nuanced and dependent on public order principles related to family law, as well as procedural fairness guarantees for all Canadians.

VIII. RELIGIOUS EDUCATION AND THE YOUTH:

Freedom of conscience and religion and religious education in public and private schools

A. Private Religious Schools

The right to create and operate private religious schools, and the right to send one’s children to such schools, is not explicitly recognized in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. It is, however, generally considered that in the Jones140 and Adler141 cases the Supreme Court recognized that freedom of conscience and religion, as well as the right to liberty recognized in section 7 of the Charter, implicitly contain the right of parents not to send their children to public school, as well as the right to have them receive religious instruction in a private school or at home, provided such instruction is "appropriate". The right of parents to send their children to a private religious school implies the right to create and operate such schools. It should also be noted that some of the existing provincial human rights statutes (among them the Quebec Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms142) explicitly affirm the right to establish private schools, including religious private schools, and to send one’s children to such schools. As explained earlier in this Report, the State is not required to offer financial assistance to such schools, but the Canadian Constitution does not prevent it from doing so, provided it is done in a non-discriminatory manner.

B. Religion in Public Schools

By invoking freedom of conscience and religion, and the principle of religious neutrality of the State that is considered an implicit component of this freedom, the Court of Appeal for Ontario ruled unconstitutional Christian religious exercises (prayer at the beginning of school activities)143 and Christian religious instruction144 in public schools, despite the possibility, in both cases, of an exemption upon parental request. The Court considered that pressure to conform and fear of peer stigmatization could deter some parents from requesting such an exemption for their children. Referring to these two decisions of the Court of Appeal for Ontario, Justice Sopinka of the Supreme Court of

141. Adler, supra n. 92. In this decision, the four judges who gave reasons on article 2(a) of the Canadian Charter (freedom of conscience and religion), supra n. 25, have emphasized that the refusal by the province of Ontario to fund private religious education did not amount to a denial of the right to educate one’s children in accordance with one’s religious beliefs insofar as the Ontario legislation did not prohibit religious education in a private school or at home. A contrario, a legislation making it mandatory for parents to send their children to secular public schools would restrict such a right.
142. Quebec Charter, supra n. 42. Section 41 reads: “[Religious and moral education] Parents or the persons acting in their stead have the right to give their children a religious and moral education in keeping with their convictions and with proper regard for their children’s rights and interests”. Section 42 reads: “[Private educational establishments] Parents or the persons acting in their stead have a right to choose private educational establishments for their children, provided such establishments comply with the standards prescribed or approved by virtue of the law”.
144. Canadian Civil Liberties Association v. Ontario (Minister of Education), (1990) 71 O.R. (2d) 341; 65 D.L.R. (4th) 1 (Ont. C.A.), leave to appeal to the Supreme Court denied. It should be noted that the interpretation given by the Ontario Court of Appeal to freedom of religion is more restrictive than what follows from international standards. The existence of non-discriminatory exemptions or alternatives that would accommodate the wishes of parents and guardians is generally considered sufficient to ensure compliance with freedom of religion guaranteed in international law. To this effect, see The right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion (art. 18) 30/07/1993. CCPR/C/21/Rev.1/Add.4, General Comment No. 22, paragraph 6.
Canada observed in the Adler case that “[t]his secular nature [of the public school system] is itself mandated by s. 2(a) of the Charter as held by several courts in this country”. In other words, the Charter requires that public schools be “secular”, that is to say that they respect the principle of religious neutrality. The principle of religious neutrality of the State, however, does not seem to prohibit the existence, within the public school system, of schools having a religious orientation as long as such schools are voluntarily chosen by parents. Such an arrangement exists, for example, in the province of Alberta. In addition, the cultural teaching about religion (religious education or instruction as opposed to religious indoctrination) may be made mandatory in public schools, provided it is dispensed in a neutral and objective way. The Court of Appeal for Ontario has defined the criteria that such cultural education about religion should respect in order to avoid violating the freedom of conscience and religion of students and/or of their parents:

- The school may sponsor the study of religion, but may not sponsor the practice of religion.
- It may expose students to all religious views, but may not impose any particular view.
- The approach to religion is one of instruction, not one of indoctrination.
- The approach is academic, not devotional.
- The school should strive for student awareness of all religions, but should not press for student acceptance of any one religion.

But compliance with these conditions may lead to a paradox. To avoid the reproach of inculcating religious values, schools will tend to present the various religions in the most neutral way possible and to emphasize the diversity of opinions about the subject. Some parents may then find that such teaching conveys a moral relativism incompatible with the religious beliefs they want to transmit to their children and that it therefore risks creating a conflict of loyalties in children, harming the relation of trust that exists with their parents. It is precisely such criticism that is directed by some parents against the Ethics and Religious Culture Program (ERC) introduced in Quebec public schools last year. This issue is currently being debated in the courts. If the court accepts the arguments of the complainants, the question will then be raised as to whether an exemption should be granted to parents who require it. To convince the courts that no exemption should be allowed, the government will have to argue that maintaining the curriculum as mandatory is justified by the aim of developing students' ability to think critically about complex and controversial subjects in order to prepare them to exercise their civic responsibilities, or by the aim of educating tolerance in children from diverse backgrounds by socializing them together. Such goals could be compromised if schools had to excuse children from participating in the educational activities that their parents consider objectionable for religious reasons. In Multani (the case concerning the wearing of a kirpan by a Sikh student in school, which is presented later in this Report) the Supreme Court of Canada attached great importance to the mission of schools to educate students about tolerance and respect between persons of different cultural, religious, or ethnic backgrounds.

145. Adler, supra n. 92 at para. 181 (Sopinka J.)

146. Canadian Civil Liberties Association v. Ontario (Minister of Education), supra n. 144, at p. 367. These criteria are taken from Religion in the Public Schools (1986), a publication of the American Association of School Administrators, at p. 33, which in turn quoted from an earlier statement of the Public Education Religion Studies Center, Wright State University.

147. Multani v. Marguerite-Bourgeoys (Commission scolaire), [2006] 1 S.C.R. 256 at para. 76: “Religious tolerance is a very important value of Canadian society. If some students consider it unfair that Gurbaj Singh may wear his kirpan to school while they are not allowed to have knives in their possession, it is incumbent on the schools to discharge their obligation to instil in their students this value that is […] at the very foundation of our democracy.” (Charron J.).
IX. RELIGIOUS SYMBOLS IN PUBLIC PLACES

A. Religious signs and symbols in public places

In Canada, the issue of religious symbols or signs in public space (understood as the sphere of public institutions) has been raised primarily with respect to the wearing of the Sikh kirpan and the Islamic headscarf. The view generally adopted differs depending on whether the wearers of such religious symbols are ordinary citizens or government agents. The Supreme Court of Canada has held that school authorities, who may legitimately prohibit the presence of weapons in schools, should nevertheless allow a Sikh student to come to school with his kirpan (a dagger with a curved blade considered to be religiously prescribed by orthodox Sikhs), provided it is worn under conditions which respect the safety of other persons attending the school (in particular, that it is maintained in a sleeve securely sewn and worn under the clothes). Conversely, the kirpan has been prohibited in courthouses and on-board aircrafts, because it is considered that in these two contexts there exists a risk to the safety of others. The issue of Islamic headscarves in schools has not yet been dealt with by the courts but in 1994 the Quebec Human Rights Commission (established under the Quebec Human Rights Act), issued an opinion to the effect that schools must allow the wearing of Islamic headscarves by students, unless it amounts to pressure on other students, provocation, or incitement to discrimination based on sex. The Commission mentioned a number of considerations that could justify the prohibition of religious symbols in schools: the fact that such symbols marginalize students (however, public schools must educate students to respect the rights and freedoms of others, precisely to avoid such marginalization), the existence of a threat to public order or gender equality and, finally, considerations of security (for example, the wearing of a hijab could be dangerous in the context of physical education or laboratory activity).

The wearing of religious symbols by teachers in carrying out their educational functions renders the question more complex because one must take into account both the right of the teachers to the free exercise of their religion, as well as the requirement of religious neutrality imposed on them as part of their professional obligations. In countries where the principle of religious neutrality of the state is interpreted rigorously, such as France and the United States, its invocation would probably suffice to justify prohibiting the wearing or displaying of religious symbols by teachers. In Canada, however, since the principle of neutrality is not specifically proclaimed but merely follows from the free exercise of religion, it should be necessary, in order to justify the ban, to demonstrate that the wearing of religious signs by teachers is likely to subject students to religious pressure and thus, to infringe their religious freedom. Such a conclusion is not inevitable as it depends on the context: the age of the children (they are evidently more vulnerable the younger they are), the discretion or, conversely, the ostentation of the sign in question, the right of the teachers to the free exercise of their religion, as well as the requirement of religious neutrality imposed on them as part of their professional obligations.

148. Multani, id.
149. In Hothi v. R., [1985] 3 W.W.R. 256 (Man. Q.B.) conf. [1986] 3 WWR 671 (Man. C.A.) the Court of Queen’s Bench of Manitoba confirmed the order of a judge of the Provincial Court banning the kirpan in the courtroom. In Nijjar v. Canada 3000 Airlines Ltd., (1999), 36 C.H.R.R. D/76, the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal, established under the Canadian Human Rights Act, rejected a complaint by a Sikh who was denied access to an airplane because of his kirpan. The tribunal took into consideration the unique environment of an aircraft, where it is impossible to have access to emergency medical or police assistance. In Pritam Singh v. Wokmen’s Compensation Board Hospital, (1981) 2 C.H.R.R. D/459 (Bd. Inq. Ont.), Mr. Singh was told he could not pass tests at the hospital if he did not remove his kirpan; a Commission of Inquiry found that the hospital could have found a solution to accommodate the beliefs of Mr. Singh and ordered that future Sikh patients be allowed to keep their kirpan, provided it is of a reasonable length, while receiving hospital care. Note also that Sikh MPs are authorized to wear the kirpan in the Canadian House of Commons, as are visitors to the House present in the gallery reserved for the public.
subject that is taught and, finally, the teacher’s general behaviour.\footnote{Pandori v. Peel Bd of Education (1990) 12 C.H.R.R. D/364 (Ont. Bd. Inq.): A board of inquiry established under the Ontario Human Rights concluded, given the evidence of absence of incidents of violence, that the kirpan must be allowed in the respondent school, both for students and for teachers and members of the school administration, but under the condition that it is of a reasonable size and is worn under the clothing so as to be invisible, as well as maintained firmly enough in its sheath to be difficult (but not impossible) to remove.}

B. The "reasonable accommodation crisis" in Quebec (2007-2008)

The judicial pronouncements on religious accommodation seem to be generally well received in Canada’s English-speaking provinces, but they raise serious reservations, and even opposition, in French-speaking Quebec. A portion of the Quebec population is concerned that after having "driven out" the Christian majority religion from public space and public schools (see the decisions analyzed above declaring unconstitutional Christian prayers and religious instruction in public schools), courts are now encouraging the expression of minority religions, particularly those of immigrants, in the same context (for example by authorizing the hijab or the kirpan in schools).

This view, however, ignores the fact that the obligation of religious neutrality is binding on public institutions, but not on private individuals who are the users of such institutions. In fact, the "reasonable accommodation crisis" that took place in Quebec in 2007-2008 (and which saw an outburst of popular opposition to the practice of religious accommodation) appears to reflect a feeling of "identity discomfort" amongst the francophone majority. Due to its minority status in Canada and throughout North America, the latter tends to consider the increasing cultural diversity of Quebec’s society resulting from immigration as a threat to its majority status and to its traditional values. For similar reasons, the federal policy of multiculturalism is not well received in Quebec.

Section 27 of the \textit{Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms}, proclaims that the interpretation thereof "shall be consistent with the preservation and enhancement of the multicultural heritage of Canadians". Although this section has yet to be given any significant legal consequence by the courts, opponents of multiculturalism in Quebec see it as encouraging "communalism".

Concerns such as these have led a significant segment of Quebecers to reject the religious accommodations imposed by the courts, and to ask for the establishment of a system of secularism modeled on the system existing in France, in the hope that it will justify the exclusion of all religious expression from "public spaces", understood not only as the sphere of state institutions, but in the broader sense of the space of social interaction (such as streets, businesses, parks, and associations in civil society). In the minds of its supporters, such secularism (that they call "republican") is assigned the double mission of fostering the emancipation of individuals in relation to religion and realizing civic integration (allegiance to a common civic identity) by neutralizing religion as an identity marker. This position has been advocated before a Commission created by the Quebec government in reaction to the reasonable accommodation crisis, the \textit{Consultation Commission on Accommodation Practices Related to Cultural Differences}, chaired by philosopher Charles Taylor and sociologist Gérard Bouchard.

C. The Bouchard-Taylor Commission Report

In its Report, published in 2008\footnote{Bouchard & Taylor, supra footnote 20. For a commentary, see: José Woehrling, “The ‘Open Secularism’ Model of the Bouchard-Taylor Commission Report and the Decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada on Freedom of Religion and Religious Accommodation”, \textit{loc. cit.}, supra n. 25.}, the Commission considered that a system of secularism (\textit{laïcité}), which it describes as "open secularism", is already in operation in Quebec, even if it has been historically defined implicitly rather than formally. For the Commission, the four key principles of any model of secularism are freedom of conscience and religion, the right of individuals to religious and moral equality, the separation of Church and State, and the principle of State neutrality towards religion. The first two principles define the final purposes that are sought by secularism, while the other two principles express themselves in the institutional structures that are essential to achieve these purposes. The latter principles can be defined and arranged in different ways and may prove to be more or less permissive or restrictive from the standpoint of religious practice. For example, advocates of "open secularism" would insist more on religious freedom and equality, even if this requires adopting a flexible conception of State neutrality. Conversely, proponents of “rigid secularism” would allow for greater restrictions of the free exercise of religion in the name of a rigorous interpretation of State neutrality and the separation of political and religious powers.

From these premises, the Commission concluded that as a general rule, government employees must be allowed to wear religious signs in the exercise of their functions, but that a limited ban is justified in the case of public officials "who occupy positions that embody at the highest level the necessary neutrality of the State", such as judges, Crown prosecutors, the president of the National Assembly of Quebec, police officers, and the like. This recommendation of the Commission has thus far not been put into practice and there does not presently exist, either in Quebec or anywhere else in Canada, any rule prohibiting the wearing of religious signs by public officials in the exercise of their functions (although one has been proposed before the Quebec legislature). On the contrary, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police (R.C.M.P.) specifically allows Sikhs serving in the force (which is under federal authority) to wear a turban instead of the traditional felt hat. While this decision of the R.C.M.P. was challenged as being contrary to the freedom of conscience and religion of members of the public who may come into contact with police officers wearing Sikh religious attributes, the courts rejected this claim.

In its Report, the Commission also recommended that the crucifix hanging above the Speaker's chair in the National Assembly (or Legislature) of Quebec be removed because it suggests a special relationship between the Legislature and the religion of the Christian majority. The very day after the Report was published, however, provincial Premier Jean Charest presented a resolution, which was adopted by a unanimous vote, to reject this recommendation and affirm the continued presence of the crucifix in the National Assembly.

X. HATE SPEECH: FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND OFFENCES AGAINST RELIGION

This section will examine the extent to which there is, in Canada, particular protection of religion in the public arena against offensive expressions. While the criminal offence of blasphemous libel is still on the books, it has proven to have little consequence in the important intersection between freedom of expression and offences against religion in this country. The true test of this intersection has come in the form of protections against hate speech which, while not limited to speech inciting hate against members of religious groups, certainly encompasses speech that vilifies groups on the basis of their religion.

156. Hate speech can be directed against any identifiable group such as those identified by religion, gender, race or sexual orientation.
A. Hate Speech

By way of overview, hate speech in Canada is regulated both at the federal level, through the Criminal Code and the Canadian Human Rights Act,\(^{157}\) as well as at the provincial level, where several provinces have specific provisions aimed at hate speech in their respective Human Rights Codes.\(^{158}\) Because regulation of hate speech often clashes with the constitutionally protected right of freedom of expression, this area of the law has been fraught with constitutional challenges, several of which have successfully impugned the relevant hate speech provisions,\(^{159}\) and others which, while upholding such provisions, have divided the Canadian Supreme Court.\(^{160}\)

In terms of federal criminal legislation, the focus is primarily on section 319(2)\(^{161}\) of the Criminal Code, a provision that recognizes the “power of words to maim”\(^{162}\) and one that is aimed at suppressing the wilful promotion of hatred against identifiable groups. In the 1990 landmark decision of \(R v. Keegstra,\)\(^{163}\) the Supreme Court upheld, by a narrow majority of 4 to 3, the constitutionality of this provision. That case concerned a High School teacher who taught his students that the Holocaust never occurred and that the Jews created the myth in order to gain sympathy.

While the Court agreed that the provision under which Keegstra was charged infringed freedom of expression entrenched in s. 2(b) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms,\(^{164}\) the majority was able to save the provision through the use of s.1 of the Charter\(^{165}\) which allows the State to set limits on rights to the extent that such limits “can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.” Section 319(2) was held to constitute a reasonable limit on freedom of expression given Parliament’s objective of preventing harm caused by hate propaganda and given that the provision meets the “proportionality test” in that its narrow ambit ensures only the most minimal impairment of such freedom.\(^{166}\)

It is to be noted that while s. 319(2) has withstood constitutional attack,\(^{167}\) another provision in the Criminal Code\(^{168}\), one that had made it an offence to “spread false news”... and which had also been considered a tool to suppress offensive expressions against religious groups, was held to be unconstitutional by a narrow majority in the Supreme Court decision of R v. Zundel.\textsuperscript{169}

To make out the elements of the hate speech offence under s. 319(2), the Crown must prove, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the accused, by communicating statements other than in private conversation, wilfully promoted hatred against a group identifiable by colour, race, religion or ethnic origin. The promotion of hatred implies that individuals are to be “despised, scorned, denied respect and made subject to ill-treatment on the basis of group affiliation”\textsuperscript{170} and its wilful nature necessitates a stringent standard of \textit{mens rea}, thereby limiting the offence to the intentional promotion of such hatred. In particular, it is not sufficient that the accused be negligent or reckless as to the result of their words but rather, that he or she desire the promotion of hatred or foresee such a consequence as certain or substantially certain to result.\textsuperscript{171} While by the Supreme Court of Canada’s own admission, this is a “difficult burden for the Crown to meet,”\textsuperscript{172} the Crown need not prove an actual causal link, namely that actual hatred resulted, but merely that the hate-monger had the required intent.\textsuperscript{173}

Furthermore, the section provides the accused with a variety of defences including the truth of the statements, as well as the ability to prove that the statements were made in good faith to advance an opinion of a religious subject. Although not a case on s. 319(2) of the Criminal Code, Owens v. Saskatchewan (Human Rights Commission)\textsuperscript{174} demonstrates how this defence could arise. Owens had placed an ad in a newspaper containing Biblical passages condemning homosexuality, including a passage from Leviticus 20:13 to the effect that homosexuals “must be put to death.” The Saskatchewan Court of Appeal did not find Owens to have contravened the relevant provincial hate speech provision and stated that “Mr. Owens published the advertisement pursuant to a sincere and \textit{bona fide} conviction forming part of his religious beliefs.”\textsuperscript{175} This case demonstrates that while hate speech may at times protect religious groups, in appropriate cases, religious freedom can itself be a defence against hate speech.

In point of fact, the high threshold in the hate speech provision has proven to be difficult to meet by the Crown, and there are very few cases where an actual conviction has resulted. This may be illustrated by the recent and highly publicized case of R v. Ahenakew\textsuperscript{176} where Ahenakew, Chief of the Federation of Saskatchewan Indian Nations, alleged in a public speech that the Jews were responsible for starting World War II and later stated to a newspaper reporter that the Holocaust was a measure taken to “get rid of a disease” and an attempt to “clean up the world.” Despite the fact that the Court characterized these remarks as “revolting, disgusting and untrue,” they did not result in a conviction under the Criminal Code. The Court found the statements were not made with the required intent of inciting hatred, but rather as a response to questions by a reporter whom the accused considered rude and aggressive.

As previously mentioned, hate speech is not only regulated through the Criminal Code but through the Canadian \textit{Human Rights Act} (hereinafter the “CHRA”) as well.\textsuperscript{177}
Section 13 of the CHRA is aimed at speech, communicated telephonically or over the Internet, that is likely to expose members of an identifiable group to hatred or contempt. While initially held, by a narrow majority of the Supreme Court of Canada, to pass constitutional muster in the case of Taylor v. Canadian Human Rights Commission, it has recently been held to be unconstitutional as an unwarranted restriction on freedom of expression in the recent Canadian Human Rights Tribunal decision of Warman v. Lemire. The change in constitutional propriety is due to amendments to the CHRA in 1998. Previously the section carried with it merely the sanction of a cease and desist order whereas the amendments added financial sanctions by way of penalties that could be levied on offenders. That was held to turn the provision, whose main purpose was previously described as “remedial, preventative and conciliatory,” into one with punitive and penal consequences, thereby no longer justifying the limit on freedom of expression on the basis of minimum impairment. The result of this recent decision of September 2009 certainly places the regulation of hate speech through non-criminal federal legislation into uncertain territory.

Several provincial and territorial human rights codes also regulate hate speech and one such provision, section 14 of the Saskatchewan Human Rights Code, has been the subject of, but passed, constitutional challenge as being a reasonable limit on freedom of expression. However, as Luke McNamara points out in his exhaustive study of hate speech at the provincial level in Canada, “a lingering unease about the legitimacy of legislative restrictions on the communication of ideas . . . has been manifested in the preference . . . for a narrow construction of the scope of provincial hate speech prohibitions.”

B. Group Defamation

Another avenue through which one may pursue offensive speech is through defamation. The major impediment to this approach as a way to redress offensive speech against identifiable groups is that traditionally, defamation is seen as a personal action based on injury to one’s own reputation and not injury to the reputation of the group to which one belongs. As such, if the statements target the group and not specific members of a group, defamation will not, according to its established ambit, apply. An interesting decision recently decided by the Quebec Court of Appeal in Diffusion Métromédia CMR Inc. c. Malhab has upheld the conventional position that unless the group is very small such that personal prejudice can be shown, racist commentary about a group will not constitute defamation. However, that case has received leave to appeal

---

178. Supra n. 160 (the Supreme Court noted that despite not requiring proof of intention, s. 13 only minimally impairs freedom of expression because the Act’s purpose is to prevent discrimination rather than punishing moral blameworthiness).

179. Supra n. 157.

180. See id. at paras. 248-290. See also Moon, Report Concerning Section 13, supra n. 155 (Moon argues that s. 13 of the CHRA, supra n. 157, as currently drafted constitutes an unjustified intrusion on the fundamental right of freedom of expression and should either be repealed or reshaped); Lynch, supra n. 177 (recommends repealing the penalty provision in s. 54(1)(c) of the CHRA and amending the CHRA to provide a statutory definition of hatred and contempt in accordance with Taylor, supra n. 160.)

181. See list of provisions supra n. 146. Note as well that even where hate speech is not specifically regulated in provincial human rights legislation, most provinces and territories make it unlawful to display notices, signs or symbols that discriminate or intend to discriminate against an identifiable group: see Luke McNamara, “Negotiating the Contours of Unlawful Hate Speech: Regulation under Provincial Human Rights Laws in Canada” (2005) 38 U.B.C. L. Rev 1 (providing an excellent overview of provincial regulation of hate speech).

183. See e.g. Orentgen v. Plamondon (1915), 24 B.R. 69 (Qc. C.A.). The plaintiff succeeded in an
by the Supreme Court of Canada\textsuperscript{187} and it remains to be seen whether the result of that decision will nuance the traditional ambit of defamation in a group setting.

The few statutory group libel provisions that exist in Canada\textsuperscript{188} have likewise not proven to be effective tools against hate speech directed at religious or other groups. According to McNamara, these statutes have been minimally used due either to the strict nature of the offence (in Manitoba, the publication must not only expose members of the target group to hatred but must also tend to raise unrest or disorder) and/or an underlying concern about constitutional validity.\textsuperscript{189}

The result is that while Canada has sought to attack hate speech through a variety of federal and provincial provisions, “free speech sensitivity has exerted a powerful influence”\textsuperscript{190} on the legitimacy and efficacy of such attempts.

XI. CONCLUSION

This Report has presented a multifaceted overview of the interaction between religion, the public and private spheres of Canadian law and everyday life. Despite the myriad of court decisions, many at the Supreme Court level, that seem to settle a great variety of issues dealing with the intersection of religion and the secular state, Canada continues to grapple with difficult questions on this topic.

As recently as March of 2010, there was a highly-publicized clash between secularism and the accommodation of religious observance in an incident involving a Muslim Egyptian woman enrolled in a French language class at a publicly-funded junior college in Montreal. For religious reasons, she wore a niqab, a headdress which covered her entire face with the exception of her eyes. Although this woman had received various accommodations from the school, at one point she was told she had to remove her niqab so that her French pronunciation could be properly tested. When she refused, she was asked to leave the school. In addition to generating a great deal of public controversy over where to draw the line between reasonable and unreasonable accommodation, this incident spurred the Quebec government to propose draft legislation which, if passed, would require employees and clients of educational, health and administrative provincial public institutions and services to interact with each other without face coverings.

In June of 2010, another important issue regarding religion and the secular state arose in the context of education. At issue was the right of a private religious school to teach a compulsory course on Ethics and Religious Culture from the viewpoint of Catholic principles that mirrored the mission of that particular school. The Quebec Minister of Education had refused the school the right to substitute its version of the course on the ground that the course was intended to teach the recognition of others and the pursuit of the common good and therefore had to offer the study of the world’s major religious traditions and ethical questions generally. The Superior Court of Quebec held that such refusal was invalid under the Quebec Charter and that it was unreasonable to assume that a confessional program could not achieve the goals proposed by the ministry program. Justice Dugré found that the high school in question was entitled the academic freedom to teach the course from the perspective of the Catholic religion that defines the mission of the school.

These are just two examples that have arisen in recent months and given the increasingly multicultural nature of Canadian society, the incidents in which religion will interact, or clash, with the secular state can only be expected to rise. As this Report has attempted to illustrate, the legal landscape in Canada is already rich with many examples

\textsuperscript{187} Leave to appeal to S.C.C. granted, 2009 CarswellQue 2824 (S.C.C.) (WLeC).
\textsuperscript{188} See Defamation Act, R.S.M. 1987, c. D20, s. 19; Civil Rights Protection Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 49, s. 2.
\textsuperscript{189} McNamara, supra n. 181 at paras. 181 at paras. 100, 108.
\textsuperscript{190} Id. at para. 232.
of accommodating this delicate balance. The near future is sure to hold even more developments of this ongoing and interesting intersection between religion, law and life.